Remodeling Can Be a Single Lifetime Purchase, Educate Yourself

We are firm believers in educating our potential clients so that they have a thorough understanding of the work that is being done. We have written articles on "How to Hire a Contractor", we provide detailed information to our clients during our in-home consultations including design ideas, proper installation practices and explanations of the materials that we use and why. The more we can educate you about our way of doing business the better you'll feel about hiring us to do your project.

Our Warranty

Our warranty for exterior work (siding, windows and roofing) covers anything that we install against installation-based failure for as long as you own your home (15 years for multi-family) and includes labor and materials. If you sell your home or building within 5 years of our project being completed, we will transfer our warranty in full to the new buyer. This is over and above all included manufacturer warranties.

Great People = A Great Company

Lifetime Remodeling Systems strives to hire people who share our vision of excellence and commit to being a different kind of remodeling company. Unlike most remodeling companies, we hire in-house employees for all the work that we complete. The only items we sub out are required by law (electrical, plumbing, excavation/flatwork) and we work with some of the best sub-contractors in Portland.

Whether you're doing a full re-side and multiple windows replaced or just one elevation, we have the best group of project consultants, designers, carpenters and installers who will make sure that you get the remodel of your dreams.

Hiring a New Contractor – A How To By Gino Streano

It's amazing to us how many clients that we meet who have had bad experiences with contractors. I had a client who recently hired me to install new windows and custom skylights comment at how I am the only contractor they'd ever had who showed up consistently on time to every scheduled meeting. I find that sad and an indictment of the state of the remodeling industry as a whole. If your contractor can't show up on time to a previously scheduled meeting, how is the rest of the project going to go? Below I've outlined a few things that will help you to weed out the bad and focus on the great contractors who are bidding on your project.

References, References, References

Demand references up front from any contractor who is bidding your job. Great contractors are eager to show off their reference list and will provide more than you need. Make sure they provide phone numbers and addresses of their previous clients and call a couple. Talking to previous clients who rave about a contractor is a great way to establish trust and provide comfort in knowing you are picking the right company. A great remodeling company should provide 10 or more references with addresses and phone numbers of their past clientele for various projects as well as available online reviews. The references should also be job specific, meaning the homes should be of a similar style and age of your home. By providing this information a contractor is backing up their claim of being great by allowing you to hear it from their previous clients, not them.

The Devil is In the Details

Once you've gotten past the references it's time to move on to a detailed description of the job itself. A great contractor will provide you with written information describing their company, the job process and the materials being used. If the contractor can't describe the process to you, then they shouldn't be doing the job.

Items That Should be Covered Are

1. Does the contractor use subs or in-house crews?
In-house crews are always preferred if possible. This ensures that the project manager has a working relationship with the crew and that the crew is fully briefed on the companies' installation practices. Good remodeling firms will typically have a mixture of in-house crews doing the main scope of work while maintaining a list of top-quality subs for trade work (electrical, plumbing etc.) whom they've established a solid working relationship with over the years.
2. Who runs the project?
Its best if the person you initially meet with also runs the project. This ensures that wild promises aren't made upfront by a salesman who doesn't have to run the project (and is looking to collect a large commission as fast as possible). It also ensures that the person you are speaking with understands the process and complexities of quoting, and managing a remodeling project, not just how to sell the products used in the job.
3. What type of materials are being used and why?
Quality contractors use top quality materials. They are easier to install, last longer and make for happier homeowners. Remember you'll always be focused on price before you hire a contractor, but once hired you forget about price and focus on the look of the job. Saving some $$$ by choosing a guy who uses cheap materials never feels good once the project starts.

Look for contractors who use stainless steel fasteners, 50-year elastomeric sealants, premium paint and high grade wood or siding products (i.e. GAF roofing components, composite decking, clear vertical grain cedar or HardiePlank siding).

4. How is the Product Installed?

A quality contractor will educate you on the correct way to install the products that are being offered. 90% of failures on a remodeled home are installation based. We replace the siding on 5-10 jobs annually because of poor quality installations. Many of these projects had the siding installed less than 5 years prior that must be removed and replaced (typically with the exact same product properly installed).

5. What Type of Warranty do You Offer?

Manufacturer warranties are typically useless as they don't cover any installation-based failure. Since 90% of failures are caused by improper installation it is imperative that your contractor offers an "installation-based warranty".

Our company offers a Lifetime Craftsmanship Warranty covering any installation-based failure for as long as you own your home. By using high quality materials, and expert in-house crews we are confident in our installations.

Confident Contractors, Great Results

A quality contractor will have confidence in their company and the methods that they use and should want to educate you on those methods. Educating clients on the front end ensures that you can share in the remodeling experience because you understand the steps that are being taken at every level of the project to ensure that not only will your house look great, but that it will last a long time. By educating yourself about the process and working with a contractor who is knowledgeable about the work that is being done you can assure yourself that you will have a good remodeling experience and avoid the "pitfalls" that so many homeowners experience through a lack of research and price-based decision making. Educate yourself upfront and choosing an educated contractor with a solid long-term reputation pays dividends once the job is finished.
